

Step 1. Learn about delayed emotional growth

In addition to alcohol or drug abuse, your loved one may have another issue. It serves as a silent partner in keeping addiction active and resistant to change. A person with Delayed Emotional Growth exhibits behaviors that lack adult responsibility and life skills. You see the addicted loved one as an adolescent or younger child since those are the prevalent behaviors displayed. Yet he or she is an adult and must be treated like one.

Step 2. Transition to an adult-to-adult relationship

In American culture, there is not a formal rite of passage when a child becomes an adult. One key to helping your adult child mature emotionally is for everyone to acknowledge that he or she is an adult. Even though it was not your fault, you may choose to apologize to your adult child for having treated him or her as an adolescent. Your “helping” has actually been hurting. Express your determination to treat him or her like an adult. Resolve to do this —especially in difficult situations.

Step 3. Set realistic boundaries & consequences

Once your adult-to-adult relationship is in place, you can establish what is acceptable in your relationship. You can also establish consequences —what happens when those mutually agreed upon boundaries are crossed. When over-stepping bounds, your adult child has to handle the consequences as an adult. You no longer will over-help him or her.

It will take time and practice to learn, but you will see the wisdom in treating your loved one like an adult even when they act like a child. Your loved one has to adjust to this new perspective. Having an understanding of what is acceptable and what consequences occur when that agreement isn't respected helps you...and your loved one...stay on course.

Step 4. Cut strings to encourage responsibility

Strings are usually financial. They might be obvious, but often they're not. (i.e. paying phone bill, storing belongings, providing room and board, receiving mail, paying auto expenses, etc.) You'll be able to pinpoint certain situations where strings are keeping your adult child from making positive changes. Once you learn to identify these strings, you can plan the wisest ways and times to cut them.

Step 5. Write your own plan

Written plans provide road maps for achievement as well as accountability. A Family Plan can be created by you with or without the help of a professional. As parents, it's important to agree with each other about what you will and will not do to help your loved one. This plan should include things such as steps for cutting strings. It's recommended that you complete your plan before approaching your loved one.

Step 6. Encourage your adult child to write their own plan for moving forward in life

Your loved one may receive benefits from developing a Recovering Person's Plan. A professional can best help your adult child create this plan. The goals need to come from your loved one, yet as parents you have input about his or her goals when they require your assistance. Your loved ones plan might list goals such as finding a job, saving money, paying debts, and consequences of relapse.

Gem to Share with Loved One

I'm educating myself so we can have a healthier relationship!

Treating my loved one like an a _____ helps him or her progress on the road to r _____ .

Writing out a plan helps us achieve it and keeps us a _____ .