At Wednesday’s news conference, Kim Humphrey shared the impact of opioid addiction on his two sons, the first starting at 15. Humphrey, who spent 32 years in law enforcement, said his years in antidrug education didn’t save his sons from addiction. “I will tell you that we felt like we were the worst parents on the planet,” he said. “We felt alone, we did not know what to do. We were ashamed.” Humphrey joined the support program Parents of Addicted Loved Ones (PAL), where he found various resources that aided in the rehabilitation of his sons. PAL and organizations like it will benefit from the settlement, Adel said.

2021-10-20	AZ-Phoenix	Television	Fox 10 Phoenix Associated Press	Maricopa County signs onto massive national opioid settlement  https://www.fox10phoenix.com/news/maricopa-county-signs-onto-massive-national-opioid-settlement In Arizona, more than 11,000 people have died in the past four years from opioid overdoses. Others who were affected by opioid, like Sean Humphrey, are speaking out. Humphrey said he remembers the first time he had OxyContin. "It was very easy to access," said Sean. "There was a large supply, there wasn't a whole lot of times right off the bat where I was without those substances." From there, it went to heroin. Humphrey's brother eventually started using. "After 10 years of this, eventually it started to change, even though we thought for sure they would not survive," said Sean's father, Kim Humphrey. Sean and his brother got clean, in part thanks to his family's involvement with recovery groups. "I think anything to be done to hold these folks accountable is a good thing. The pharmaceutical companies knew exactly what they were doing with OxyContin. They were deceptive in their business practices," said Sean.
